Perceptions Towards Current U.S. Immigration Policies Among Latino Immigrant Communities
AP Research

Abstract

While significant scholarly attention has been paid to the effects current U.S. immigration policies have on Latino communities by shifting how host societies view the impacts on immigration on their economies, increasing negative connotations among host societies surrounding immigrants, and negatively impacting their physical and mental health. Little attention has been paid to how the effects of these current policies shape how Latino immigrants within the United States perceive immigration policies. The primary objective of the present study is to examine how U.S. immigration policies that marginalize and discriminate against immigrant communities can shape Latino immigrants' perceptions on immigration policy. Adopting a quantitative approach to a descriptive research design, the present study used surveys with Likert scales and multiple choice questions to evaluate where Latino immigrant identifying individuals, 18 years of age and older, perceive the
